Diaspora?

- All diasporic journeys are composite. They emerge of heterogeneous and contested spaces in the construction of a common ‘we’. Diasporic groups are not necessarily homogeneous or bounded by a single identity. Within themselves different regimes of power operate (class, gender, race, sexuality, religion, original regional location or identity, etc.)
Transnational and diasporic spaces

- In order not to essentialize the identity and politics of diasporic groups, it is perhaps better to think of diaspora as a category of practice (Brubaker, 2005) used to make claims, to articulate projects, to formulate expectations, to mobilize energies and appeal to loyalties. Also because not all members of a putative diaspora adopt a diasporic stance.

- The Internet has facilitated the cultural and communication flows among transnational/diasporic subjects. Moreover, it has enabled the creation of transnational social spaces (Karim, 2003)
New media replaces ‘old media’?

- People’s mobility from and to the islands has long relied on boat connections and, more recently, on air connections.
- The role of barrels, packages, letters and phone calls have long been crucial to the maintenance of links between Cape Verdeans.
- The Internet and the sort of communication technologies it offers (chat, sites, email, etc) is not replacing old forms but complementing them.
Production and circulation

- The Cape Verdean diaspora in the U.S. has been one of the most active in producing Internet sites.

- Cape Verdeans based in Cape Verde have also been using the Internet to connect with Cape Verdeans living outside the country.

- In Portugal, most of the sites produced by and for Cape Verdeans are put together by students recently arrived to the country from Cape Verde.

A new diasporic sociality?

- The sites want to create a community of affinity or, in Law’s (2003) terms, an ‘imagined community of action’ based on the grounds that people share a common ancestry, place of birth or family ties back in Cape Verde. Moreover they also share the experience of migration. The networks of people dispersed across space are now thought as ‘added value’.

- The sites display different language politics.
Different groups, different politics?

- The Cape Verdean diaspora in the US uses the Internet not only to empower their group within US society but also to create a diasporic and networked sociality among CV over the Internet.

- Their counterparts in Portugal seem to be particularly interested in building alliances with other ethnic groups originating from other former Portuguese colonies.
