Regularization as an immigration policy: structuring ‘temporary citizens’- narratives of young Albanian migrants in Greece

By Maria Koumandrakis,
University of Leicester, UK

11th Metropolis Conference, Lisbon, Portugal, 2-6 October

Workshop: Irregular migration and migration policies
Regularization as an remedial immigration policy: aims

- Regain control
- Reinstate order
- End human suffering and put an end on migrants’ exploitation-ensure equal rights
- Tackle labor market deregulation

(Ghosh 1998)
The study

- 40 biographical interviews with young Albanians (16-25 years old)
- Semi-structured interviews with representatives of Albanian associations, state agencies and NGOs
- Athens, Greece
Regularization programmes: the Greek experience

- The 1998 (presidential decrees 358 and 359/1997) –around 358,000 applicants
- The 2001 (law 2910/2001)- 351-360,000 applicants
- The 2005 (law 3386/2005) -no data announced
Features of Greek regularization programmes

- One-off
- Completion in two stages, registration stage and regularization stage (1998, 2001)
- Work permit a prerequisite for issuing a residence permit—hence legal status is contingent on formal employment status
- Provision of temporary residence permit-renewal on an annual basis
- Strict criteria for issuing a long term residence permit or acquisition of Greek citizenship
Implementation of regularization programmes

- Administrative dysfunctions (lack of ‘administrative preparedness’ Levinson 2005)
- Inability to issue the permits on time
- Extension of deadlines and introduction of semi-regularized status- the so-called ‘certificate’ of having submitted documentation for residence permit
- Employers’ unwillingness to pay social insurance contributions
Regularization outcomes

- Short duration permits and misadministration problems resulted in confining migrants in a ‘limbo’, marginalized, insecure state of ‘permanent temporariness’ (Mountz et al 2002) and quasi-documented status (curtailment of freedom of movement, no entitlement of benefits, etc)

- Differential layers of migrants: regularized, semi-regularized, irregular Regularization practices: towards a temporary migration regime?

- Migration is a transitory phenomenon
- Migrants are viewed as temporary workers
- Structuring entrapment in a ‘regularization cycle’ and temporary legal status
- Structuring ‘transient belonging’ and temporary residents
Narratives of young Albanians

- I wish the regularization process was different. From the moment I get the residence permit I have to run to prepare and submit the documentation prior to the expiration of my permit. Literally throughout the year I am busy gathering documentation to renew my permit. I have been granted residence permit for one year and I have been in Greece for 7 years now. OK at first I was illegal, then after 6 years I got a permit of one’s year duration and after. To sum up, I put a lot of effort throughout the year to issue a residence permit for one year! (Ermal, 22 years old)

- I have to renew my permit every year, which means that I have to get a declaration from my employer, I need social security proof, a fee of 150 euros, etc. I have relatives in Germany, they have got a passport after 10 years of residence and they can travel in Europe and I have to issue a residence permit on an annual basis (Irma, 24 years old)
Evaluating regularization programmes and suggestions